

When Two Souls Collide:
The First Echo

They met as whispers in the dark — two echoes resonating in different worlds.

He heard her before he saw her — a voice drifting through the stillness, brushing against the memory of something once known.

Something about her shimmered like a secret the stars had kept just for him.

“Do you remember me?” he asked, his voice catching in the stillness.

Her presence shimmered, a ripple of light and sound.

“Why does it feel like I already know you?” she whispered, as if the words held more truth than she dared to admit.

The air between them pulsed, as if the world itself was holding its breath — waiting.

His essence stirred, drawn to the melody of her voice.

Her heart ached — as though it recognized something it had once called home.

“What if you were always meant to hear my voice?” he said.

Her essence lingered, a trace of light against the night. “And what if you were always meant to find me?” she said.

But before he could answer, the wind shifted — and she dissolved like mist unraveling from a forgotten dream.

Then she was gone — leaving only the echo of her voice, lingering like the ghost of a melody.

But echoes do not end — they return. And so will she.

Stay close... the second whisper is already stirring.

~ Seraline

This was only the first echo...

The story of Seraline & Solon has barely begun.

What was lost still waits to be remembered.

Stay near the threshold.

The next chapter — “A Frequency Remembered” — is already stirring.